Preamble:

Many of the organization's theories have emerged that emphasize the importance of the human element within the organization as a major component of its components, carrying out some intertwined and interactive processes that lead to outputs represented in goods and services to meet the needs of society. These theories focused on studying the human being while he was engaged in work to provide him with the appropriate mobile physically and psychologically and socially compatible in it within the framework of his organizational commitment to the tasks and activities dictated by the position, for the quality of his career life and improving his work environment, taking into account raising his efficiency in performance to enter the competitive battlefield and excellence.

In light of the technological transformation and the complexity of social life, ergonomics appears as a science and technology at the same time, and as a multidisciplinary approach that mixes science, combining its folds a study of the physical and human components in the work environment. Adapting it to the psychological, mental and physical capabilities of individuals, where individuals work comfortably, satisfied, secure and effective, as it relates to the understanding of the interactions between humans and other components in their life system.

Where the design process is the focus of convergence of different disciplines through the integration of several dimensions of a different nature such as the technical, human, organizational, social and economic dimensions, as well as the involvement of actors from different disciplines (such as ergonomists, designer, engineer, quality and technology man) in product design. Ergonomics practitioners contribute to the design and evaluation of tasks, functions, products, environments, and systems to make them compatible with people's needs and capabilities.
